Tracy Hardy, DNP, APRN

The title of Tracy's clinical doctorate project is "Firefighter Occupational Cancer Risk: Starting The Conversation". Many studies have shown firefighters have a higher risk of developing occupational related cancers. The aim of Tracy's project was to determine if a 20 minute educational session would increase the firefighter's knowledge of occupational cancer risk and increase the firefighter's motivation to have a conversation with their Primary Care Provider (PCP) in regards to their occupational cancer risk. A critical component of her project included creating an educational wallet card that firefighters can use as a tool to help facilitate this conversation with their PCP. The overarching goal of Tracy's project was based on the potential that motivating firefighters to have a conversation with their PCP in regards to their occupational cancer risk could potentially result in earlier detection of cancers in firefighters, leading to increased survival rates. The informational wallet card designed to prompt conversation between a firefighter and their PCP may also have a secondary effect of increasing health care provider awareness of occupational related cancer risk in the firefighter population.

Tracy was awarded a faculty scholarship grant which helped support the creation of her wallet cards. In February 2019, Tracy will travel to a national convention in New Orleans to present her project in support of creating healthy work environments. ■
